WHAT IS THIS THING CALLED, LOVE?

In this issue:

Dead end
Latest X-Men instalment misses the mark

Reality remade
In praise of the father of pop art

Top draw
Handmade tale defies the digital age

CONTACT US:
info@scmp.com

South China Morning Post

Inside ARTS & ENTERTAINMENT

C12 Thursday, May 19, 2016

Behind the scenes of sticky behavior

The president said, "I'm not happy with it... I don't like it."

The question is, "How do you proceed?"

The situation appears to be worsening. In June, the Hong Kong government announced plans to increase the number of sex education teachers, but that has not prevented the spread of inappropriate behaviour among the students. Teachers have been found to be using explicit images and videos in their classes, and some have even been caught having sex with students.

Schools in Hong Kong are facing growing pressure to improve their sex education programs, but many parents and educators are concerned that the current approach is not effective or comprehensive enough.

Sex education in Hong Kong schools is still as hazy as it was years ago.

Michael Yu, a sex education teacher at an international school in Hong Kong, said that many students are still not able to make informed decisions about sex.

"Many students lack the knowledge and skills to make healthy choices," he said. "We need to do more to teach them about sex education, and we need to do it in a way that is sensitive to their needs and their culture."

Yu noted that sex education in Hong Kong is still in its infancy, and that there is a lack of resources and support for educators.

"We need more training and support for our teachers," he said. "We need more resources to help them teach about sex education in a way that is effective and comprehensive."